Contents

Epigram
Robin Morgan
Monster

Foreword
Diane Bell and Renate Klein
Beware: Radical Feminists Speak, Read, Write, Organise, Enjoy Life, and Never Forget

Section 1: Speaking Radically
Inés Talamantez
Women of all Nations

Robin Morgan
Light Bulbs, Radishes, and the Politics of the 21st Century

Robyn Rowland and Renate Klein
Radical Feminism: History, Politics, Action

Joy James
Experience, Reflection, Judgment and Action: Teaching Theory, Talking Community

Catharine A. MacKinnon
From Practice to Theory, or What is a White Woman Anyway?

Ngahuia Te Awekotuku
Maori-Lesbian-Feminist Radical
Angela Bowen
Enabling a Visible Black Lesbian Presence in Academia: A Radically Reasonable Request 62
Pat Mahony and Christine Zmroczek
Working-Class Radical Feminism: Lives Beyond the Text 67
Robyn Rowland
Politics of Intimacy: Heterosexuality, Love and Power 77
Louise Armstrong
The Great Incest Hijack 87
Celia Kitzinger
Therapy and How it Undermines the Practice of Radical Feminism 92
Jocelyne A. Scutt
The Personal is Political 102
Morny Joy
Looking for God in All the Wrong Places: Feminists Seeking the Radical Questions in Religion 111
Suzanne Bellamy
The Narrow Bridge of Art and Politics 126
Angela Bowen
Take Your Pageant and Shove It 135

Section Two: Radical Feminists Under Attack

Marcia Ann Gillespie
The Posse Rides Again 141
Diane Richardson
“Misguided, Dangerous and Wrong”: On the Maligning of Radical Feminism 143
Tania Lienert
On Who is Calling Radical Feminists “Cultural Feminists” and Other Historical Sleights of Hand 155

Ailbhe Smyth
A (Political) Postcard from a Peripheral Pre-Post-modern State (of Mind) or How Alliteration and Parentheses can Knock you down Dead in Women’s Studies 169
Victoria Robinson and Diane Richardson
Repackaging Women and Feminism: Taking the Heat Off Patriarchy 179
Kathleen Barry
Deconstructing Deconstructionism (or, Whatever Happened to Feminist Studies?) 188
Deirdre Carraher, Sharon Cox, Elizabeth Daake, Michele Gagne, Patricia Good, Jessie McMannon, and Marjorie O’Connor
“Generation X”, the “Third Wave”, or Just Plain Radical: Reviewing the Reviewers of Catharine MacKinnon’s Only Words 193
Andrea Dworkin
Dworkin on Dworkin 203
Catharine A. MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin
Statement on Canadian Customs and Legal Approaches to Pornography 218
Ellen Travis
Stranger than Fiction: The Backlash on Campus at the University of Victoria 222
Janice G. Raymond
Connecting Reproductive and Sexual Liberalism 231
Diane Bell
Speaking of Things that Shouldn’t be Written: Cross-cultural Excursions into the Land of Misrepresentations 247
Uta Enders-Dragässer and Brigitte Sellach
Educational Research De-Radicalized: A Warning from Germany 254
Pauline Bart
The Banned Professor or, How Radical Feminism Saved Me from Men Trapped in Men’s Bodies and Female Impersonators, with a Little Help from my Friends 262
Sandra Coney
The Last Post for Feminism 275
Section Three: Radical Feminists “Interrogate” Post-modernism

Susan Hawthorne
Deconstructing Fashion 279

Kristin Waters
(Re)turning to the Modern: Radical Feminism and the Post-modern Turn 280

Somer Brodribb
Nothing Mat(t)ers 297

Barbara Christian
The Race for Theory 311

Charlene Spetnag
The Disembodied Worldview of Deconstructive Post-modernism 321

Denise Thompson
The Self-contradiction of “Post-modernist” Feminism 325

Katja Mikhailovich
Post-modernism and its “Contribution” to Ending Violence Against Women 339

Renate Klein
(Dead) Bodies Floating in Cyberspace: Post-modernism and the Dismemberment of Women 346

Sheila Jeffreys
Return to Gender: Post-modernism and Lesbian and Gay Theory 359

Sue Wilkinson and Celia Kitzinger
The Queer Backlash 375

Christine Delphy
“French Feminism”: An Imperialist Invention 383

Joan Hoff
The Pernicious Effect of Post-structuralism on Women’s History 393

Somer Brodribb
Withdrawing her Energy 413

Carol Anne Douglas
I’ll Take the Low Road: A Look at Contemporary Feminist Theory 417

Section Four: Refusing to be Silenced

Yenlin Ku
Selling a Feminist Agenda on a Conservative Market: The Awakening Experience in Taiwan 423

Diana Russell
US Pornography Invades South Africa 429

Teboho E. Maitse
The Past is the Present: Thoughts from the New South Africa 436

Tatyana Mamonova
Freedom and Democracy: Russian Male Style 441

Kathleen Barry
Pornography and the Global Sexual Exploitation of Women 448

Natalie Nenadic
Femicide: A Framework for Understanding Genocide 456

Evelyne Accad
Truth versus Loyalty 465

Marjorie Agosin
Through the Smoke We Remember: Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo 470

Evelina Giobbe
The Market Place of Ideas 479

Section Five: Feminism Reclaimed

Susan Hawthorne
From Theories of Indifference to a Wild Politics 483

Santa Barbara Rape Crisis Center/Centro Contra la Violación
Declaración de Propósito/Mission Statement 502

Powhiri Rika-Heke and Sigrid Markmann
Common Language: Different Cultures 505
Nganampa Health Council
Our Health Project 516

UBINIG
Declaration of People’s Perspectives on “Population” Symposium 519

Mahnaz Afkhami
Towards Global Feminism: A Muslim Perspective 525

Cathie Dunsford, Beryl Fletcher, Susan Sayer
Surfing the Edge of the Alphabet 528

Berit Ås
A Feminist University: The Thrill and Challenges, Conflicts and Rewards of Trying to Establish an Alternative Education 535

Jalna Hanmer
Taking Ourselves Seriously 546

Mary Daly
The Witches Return: Patriarchy on Trial 551

Robyn Rowland
The Burying of Hughes 557

A Po-mo Quiz 558

Bibliography 562

Notes on Contributors 607

Index 617

---

Robin Morgan

Monster*

May my hives bloom bravely until my flesh is aflame and burns through the cobwebs.
May we go mad together, my sisters.
May our labor agony in bringing forth this revolution be the death of all pain.

May we comprehend that we cannot be stopped.

May I learn how to survive until my part is finished.
May I realize that I am a monster. I am a monster.

And I am proud.

* Extract from Robyn Morgan (1972) Monster.
because of their openly voiced anger and passionate call to end women's oppression. But radical feminism is passionate. We are passionately committed to Women's Liberation and through our work we hope to impassion others. Nothing less will do if we are to develop theories and practices for a future in which women can live autonomous as well as socially responsible lives.

Joy James

Experience, Reflection, Judgment and Action: Teaching Theory, Talking Community

Contemporary African American theorists think within an African and community-centered tradition in which the creativity of a people in the race for theory sustains humanity. Barbara Christian writes that theory not rooted in practice is elitist (1987, p. 336). However, teaching theory as non-elitist, and intending the liberation and development of humanity, specifically African communities, contradicts much of academic theory1 which is Eurocentric.

Making Our Presence Known

Before I can even teach theory, given its current social construction as biologically marked, I seem continuously challenged to "prove" that I am qualified. Comparing my work experiences with those of other African American women academics, I notice that despite our having been hired through a highly competitive process, we seem to be asked more routinely, almost reflexively, if we have PhDs. We could attribute this, and have, to our "diminutive" height, youngish appearance or casual attire. Yet I notice that White women about our height, unsuited, and under sixty, seem not to be interrogated as frequently about their qualifications. Continuously asked my "qualifications" as a "theorist" I cited to the inquisitive or inquisition: my training — a degree in political philosophy; my research — a dissertation on a European theorist; or my employment — teaching theory courses in academe. These

8. See Frye (1983), A Note on Anger, for an excellent discussion of the meaning of this anger.

1. Native American writer Lee Maracle (1990, p. 3) notes the circular logic of academic theory: "Theory: If it can't be shown, it can't be understood. Theory is a proposition, proven by demonstrable argument. Argument: Evidence, proof. Evidence: demonstrable testimony, demonstration ... Argument is defined as evidence; proof or evidence is defined by demonstration or proof; and theory is a proposition proven by demonstrable evidence. None of these words exist outside of their inter-connectedness. Each is defined by the other".
are prerequisites for institutional membership but not measurements of competency. I accept that nothing will qualify me to students and faculty who do philosophy, and theorizing centered on liberation. Form on the praxis of African American women permits me to claim that I think. Connecting my teaching to community organizing allows me to say I theorize.

Service in African/Black liberation qualifies me. These qualifications make me a suspicious character if not "unqualified" for academia. A hydra for teachers and students who do not set them, criteria established without our input appear like shrouds. The issue is not whether there should be academic standards and qualifications; there always are. The issue is who sets and will set them, and for whose benefit they function. The reward of transgressing conventional academic standards is re-establishing connections to some community wisdom and practice larger than academe. The specter of failing models of knowledge and teaching.

In teaching, I try to learn and share more about the history of social thought. Teaching about the origins of the "academy", "philosophy" and "theory" as predating the "Greek ancestors" of "Western civilization" broadens the scope of both philosophy and theory. Philosophy extends beyond the appearance of Europeans (and their designated ancestors) in history; so theory extends beyond the spaces they occupy or dominate. To restrict our discussions of the contributions of Black/African cosmology and philosophy to the "contemporary" period implies that Black/African cosmology and philosophy is "sui generis" thinking of "Europeanized" Greeks; "Medieval" the EUlurope of Rawls, Arendt, and Bentham in contemporary political theory. In "essential feminist writings", Ida B. Wells is taught alongside Mary Wollstonecraft and Susan B. Anthony; Virginia Woolf and Mary Daly are placed beside Assata Shakur and Audre Lorde.

The ways in which I teach theory are changing. Cultivating respectfulness in myself and seeking it in my students, I ask my classes "Who are you? Do you know your personal and political relationship to the knowledge studied?" I find that autobiographical theorizing discourages appropriation and objectification, while encouraging students to identify themselves as potential theorists and embark in self-reflections that include critiques of racist, classist and (hetero)sexist assumptions (a "backlash" usually follows any sustained critique of entrenched, dominant biases). I urge students to carefully consider the claim by revolutionary African American women who write that the roles of living thinkers are open to all and that they are not "exceptional" (those who participate in a legacy follow rather than deviate from the normative).

Students encounter the women's images and voices through video and audio tapes that supplement readings for discussions on women's contributions to and roles in liberation struggles. These images, along with exploring our relationships and responsibilities to writers, stories, and theories, pull us off the sidelines as "spectators" and consumers of Africana "performance" towards our own roles as actors. Contending with my own "consumerism", I find that progressive activists give me more than subject matter for courses; they also provide instruction in philosophy and democratic pedagogy. I am pushed most as a teacher-student when wrestling with the implications of philosophy and theorizing in the autobiographies of revolutionary African American women. More than any other type of writing, this form prods me to confront my personal and political responsibilities to ancestors, youth, and future generations. Attempting to share what I learn, the internal obstacles appear. They emerge out of my physical and sometimes intellectual alienation from work for community liberation and the philosophers and theorists of the community. They coexist with the ever present external obstacles of indifference and hostility towards Black liberation theorizing. Despite the internal and external obstacles, I begin to fear less being dismissively ignored by academics and fear more my own ignorance about and faltering ties to our ancestors' loving, radical traditions. Although it grates the academic norm, responsibility means that legitimacy and authority come from the humanity of my communities.

Extending time to find other origins of theory, I encounter more comprehensive spaces and thoughts. Hypatia, the (Egyptian) woman philosopher, sits with the "Ancient" philosophers of academic masculinist theory. The Kongo women kings theorize in a unique cosmology coexisting with the space occupied by Locke, and Rousseau and other philosophers of the European Enlightenment. Angela Davis and Black/African revolutionary theorizing coexist with the European (American) liberalism of Rawls, Arendt, and Bentham in contemporary political theory. In "essential feminist writings", Ida B. Wells is taught alongside Mary Wollstonecraft and Susan B. Anthony; Virginia Woolf and Mary Daly are placed beside Assata Shakur and Audre Lorde.

The ways in which I teach theory are changing. Cultivating respectfulness in myself and seeking it in my students, I ask my classes "Who are you? Do you know your personal and political relationship to the knowledge studied?" I find that autobiographical theorizing discourages appropriation and objectification, while encouraging students to identify themselves as potential theorists and embark in self-reflections that include critiques of racist, classist and (hetero)sexist assumptions (a "backlash" usually follows any sustained critique of entrenched, dominant biases). I urge students to carefully consider the claim by revolutionary African American women who write that the roles of living thinkers are open to all and that they are not "exceptional" (those who participate in a legacy follow rather than deviate from the normative).

Students encounter the women's images and voices through video and audio tapes that supplement readings for discussions on women's contributions to and roles in liberation struggles. These images, along with exploring our relationships and responsibilities to writers, stories, and theories, pull us off the sidelines as "spectators" and consumers of Africana "performance" towards our own roles as actors. Contending with my own "consumerism", I find that progressive activists give me more than subject matter for courses; they also provide instruction in philosophy and democratic pedagogy. I am pushed most as a teacher-student when wrestling with the implications of philosophy and theorizing in the autobiographies of revolutionary African American women. More than any other type of writing, this form prods me to confront my personal and political responsibilities to ancestors, youth, and future generations. Attempting to share what I learn, the internal obstacles appear. They emerge out of my physical and sometimes intellectual alienation from work for community liberation and the philosophers and theorists of the community. They coexist with the ever present external obstacles of indifference and hostility towards Black liberation theorizing. Despite the internal and external obstacles, I begin to fear less being dismissively ignored by academics and fear more my own ignorance about and faltering ties to our ancestors' loving, radical traditions. Although it grates the academic norm, responsibility means that legitimacy and authority come from the humanity of my communities.

2. Academic's presentation of time and consequently the history of thought promotes the delusion that philosophy (and civilization) began with "Greeks". The role and contributions of Black/African scholars who preceded and taught them and the African civilizations often erased before Athens are ignored. Voids in timelines manufacture artificial "origins" which legitimizing European dominance erases African contributions in "essential feminist writings", Ida B. Wells is taught alongside Mary Wollstonecraft and Susan B. Anthony; Virginia Woolf and Mary Daly are placed beside Assata Shakur and Audre Lorde.

3. Bernice Johnson Reagon (1991) argues this about the work of Martin Luther King, Jr.
Talking Theory: Activism in Pedagogy

Pedagogy rooted in ethical concerns and an epistemology based on a four-part process of experience, reflection, judgment, and action organizes my courses.

readings stimulate and challenge students to expand their experiential base. They then enter their reflections in journals, essay papers, and compare their insights in small student work groups. Judging dominant norms, students design activities or projects to demystify and challenge economic and racial-sexual oppression, and subsequently, they organize to resist oppression, we walk closer to the place where humane political thinkers stand. There, hopefully with a less distant and more substantial awareness of their theorizing, we begin to comprehend and critique.

I argue for activism as an indispensable component in learning. Action promotes consciousness of one's own political practice; such self-consciousness is a prerequisite to literacy. "Interest" in the lives of Black women and democratic struggles is superficial and the "knowledge" acquired specious if one remains illiterate in the language of community and commitment spoken by the women activists. Activism promotes literacy. It is usually the greatest and most difficult learning experience, particularly if it is connected to communities and issues broader than the parameters of academic life.

Theory and philosophy "born in struggle" carry extremely difficult lessons. Activism concretizing ethical ideals in action, allows us to better comprehend a form of thinking unfamiliar in abstract academic thought — theorizing under fire or under conditions of confrontation or repression. Thinking to stay alive and be free is the heart of liberation praxis. For half a millennium, Indigenous and African peoples in the Americas and Africa have theorized for their lives and the life of the community. Theorizing as a life and death endeavor rather than leisureed, idle speculation, embodies revolutionary praxis. As faculty we may find ourselves in positions where living by our beliefs and theory carries the hazards of not receiving grants, promotion or tenure; students may lose male companions in domestic violence interrupted the proceedings, bitterly denouncing the court for ignoring their desperate petitions, as living women, to stop their batterers.

And recognition mean communicating our wisdom and humanity in struggle, regardless, then pedagogy will be the transport.
and activists such as Harriet Tubman; Anne Moody; Assata Shakur; Martin Luther King, Jr.; Malcolm X; and Fred Hampton.\(^5\)

Several years ago, while a visiting scholar at a mid-western university, I had the opportunity to learn more about how risk-taking and radical organizing test ideas, ideologies, and commitments. During my semester tenure, the Ku Klux Klan based in campus town was planning a rally in the local national headquarters in Indiana decided to march and stage a rally in the local public square. The general response against the march and rally centered on individualism and consumerism, which was not the response of the students who were impressed by activist stories of courage and influence. I was informed that the Ku Klux Klan rally was part of a women's film festival, a small number of students viewed the film, and during the discussion session that followed the video, African American students and faculty facilitated the discussion session that followed the video. Students shared how they were impressed by Ida B. Wells' courage and social awareness about the issue of lynching in America. \(^6\)

African American groups, European Americans, and European Jewish Americans formed a coalition with European Americans and European Jewish Americans and gay and lesbian activists. Some of these African American women students had experienced racial and sexual violence on the campus. At an early organizing meeting, African American seniors spoke of being drag or thrown into bushes as their White male assailant yelled "nigger bitch" while repeatedly punching her. As she struggled away she noticed White student spectators who made no attempt to assist or intervene. The woman student stated that the university's failure to investigate and handle the attack were equally disrespectful.

Faculty criticisms and complaints about White dominated universities, African American students, and faculty administrators, like their White counterparts, were reluctant to support student organizing and publicize their concerns. Most African American faculty and administrators, like their White counterparts, were reluctant to support student organizing and publicize their concerns. Many African American students believed faculty and administrators were not interested in or willing to engage in the type of activism and restructuring necessary to supplant tokenism.

Supporting progressive curricula and pedagogies demands political change. Yet, my experiences show that few are willing to engage in the type of activism and restructuring necessary to supplant tokenism. If anything I do in the way of writing... isn't about the village or the community or about you, then it is not about anything. I am not interested in indulging myself in some private, closed exercise of my imagination that fulfills only the obligation of my personal dreams - which is to say, yes, the work must be political. It must have that as its thrust. That's a pejorative term in critical circles now: if a work of art has any political influence in it, somehow it's tainted. My feeling is just the opposite: if it has none, it is tainted (1984, pp. 344-45).

Fear of criticizing the administration or faculty, along with homophobia, sexism and caste elitism allowed faculty and more conservative African American students to distance themselves from student activists. Yet students and faculty faced the greatest dangers from racial sexual violence on campus and in society. Alongside community women and men, only two European American women and I as faculty actively organized with students educating against, in the wake of the Klan rally, increasing racist antisemitic verbal abuse and physical violence on campus. The Klan rally highlighted faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic and sexual violence on campus.

It seemed that we faculty and administrators believed our class and caste status in academe granted us immunity from the violence assaulting many African American youth, women, and gay, lesbian and bisexual students. My own inability to critically analyze and respond to faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic, and sexual violence on campus.

Community

Individual changes in classroom teaching to deconstruct racist heterosexist curricula and build community are marginal unless supported by the department or program and other instructors. Often the struggles for more accuracy and accountability in education are labelled and depoliticized as personal (personnel) whims of faculty rather than responsible action. I have found that personalizing my confrontations with Eurocentric thinkers or academic careerists is a form of depoliticization that contributes to my own isolation and ineffectualness. Supporting progressive curricula and pedagogies demands political change. Yet, my experiences show that few are willing to engage in the type of activism and restructuring necessary to supplant tokenism.

I share Toni Morrison's observations in "Rootedness: The Ancestor As Foundation", applying her thoughts on writing to teaching, another art form:

Fearing to criticize the administration or faculty, along with homophobia, sexism and caste elitism allowed faculty and more conservative African American students to distance themselves from student activists. Yet students and faculty faced the greatest dangers from racial sexual violence on campus and in society. Alongside community women and men, only two European American women and I as faculty actively organized with students educating against, in the wake of the Klan rally, increasing racist antisemitic verbal abuse and physical violence on campus. The Klan rally highlighted faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic, and sexual violence on campus.

Fear of criticizing the administration or faculty, along with homophobia, sexism and caste elitism allowed faculty and more conservative African American students to distance themselves from student activists. Yet students and faculty faced the greatest dangers from racial sexual violence on campus and in society. Alongside community women and men, only two European American women and I as faculty actively organized with students educating against, in the wake of the Klan rally, increasing racist antisemitic verbal abuse and physical violence on campus. The Klan rally highlighted faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic, and sexual violence on campus.

Community

Individual changes in classroom teaching to deconstruct racist heterosexist curricula and build community are marginal if not supported by the department or program and other instructors. Often the struggles for more accuracy and accountability in education are labelled and depoliticized as personal (personnel) whims of faculty rather than responsible action. I have found that personalizing my confrontations with Eurocentric thinkers or academic careerists is a form of depoliticization that contributes to my own isolation and ineffectualness. Supporting progressive curricula and pedagogies demands political change. Yet, my experiences show that few are willing to engage in the type of activism and restructuring necessary to supplant tokenism.

I share Toni Morrison's observations in "Rootedness: The Ancestor As Foundation", applying her thoughts on writing to teaching, another art form:

Fearing to criticize the administration or faculty, along with homophobia, sexism and caste elitism allowed faculty and more conservative African American students to distance themselves from student activists. Yet students and faculty faced the greatest dangers from racial sexual violence on campus and in society. Alongside community women and men, only two European American women and I as faculty actively organized with students educating against, in the wake of the Klan rally, increasing racist antisemitic verbal abuse and physical violence on campus. The Klan rally highlighted faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic, and sexual violence on campus.

Fear of criticizing the administration or faculty, along with homophobia, sexism and caste elitism allowed faculty and more conservative African American students to distance themselves from student activists. Yet students and faculty faced the greatest dangers from racial sexual violence on campus and in society. Alongside community women and men, only two European American women and I as faculty actively organized with students educating against, in the wake of the Klan rally, increasing racist antisemitic verbal abuse and physical violence on campus. The Klan rally highlighted faculty ambivalence and refusal to support student organizing and the university administration's unwillingness to publicly take an uncompromised stance against and responsible action for diminishing racist, antisemitic, homophobic, and sexual violence on campus.

Experience, Reflection, Judgment and Action

If anything I do in the way of writing... isn't about the village or the community or about you, then it is not about anything. I am not interested in indulging myself in some private, closed exercise of my imagination that fulfills only the obligation of my personal dreams - which is to say, yes, the work must be political. It must have that as its thrust. That's a pejorative term in critical circles now: if a work of art has any political influence in it, somehow it's tainted. My feeling is just the opposite: if it has none, it is tainted (1984, pp. 344-45).
Academics and students, if not always content, seem comparatively “safe” from the political-economic conditions destroying African communities and villages. Educational status and economic “stability” grant us space to move about the world as if our survival were guaranteed, despite the increasing impoverishment and death of Africans worldwide. Privilege may reduce our primary preoccupation in academia to accreditation and legitimacy from the intellectual representatives of the “new” old world order.

I am paid — and so I pay my bills and taxes to the military — by teaching “theory” in a White university’s White Women’s Studies program in a White suburb called “Amherst.” On my better days, I think freely about a people loving and theorizing for liberation. I try to think in the traditions in which philosophy and theory are the tools of initiates and “slaves” to the community, rather than the techniques of academic employees; this is problematic in places where people talk and write about life and death in and to abstraction. Although at times afraid to forget and to always remember my indebtedness to the militant Black praxis that forced open the doors of White academia, I am grateful to the call to be in a tradition of midwifery to philosophizing and theorizing, a tradition that intends community and respect for African ancestors, the living, and future born.

Catharine A. MacKinnon

From Practice to Theory, or What is a White Woman Anyway?*

And ain’t I a woman?

— Sojourner Truth

Black feminists speak as women because we are women...

— Audre Lorde

It is common to say that something is good in theory but not in practice. I always want to say, then it is not such a good theory, is it? To be good in theory but not in practice posits a relation between theory and practice that places theory prior to practice, both methodologically and normatively, as if theory is a terrain unto itself. The conventional image of the relation between the two is first theory, then practice. You have an idea, then act on it. In legal academia you theorize, then try to get some practitioner to put it into practice. To be more exact, you read law, review articles, then write more law review articles. The closest most legal academics come to practice is teaching — their students, most of whom will practice, being regarded by many as an occupational hazard to their theorizing.

The postmodern version of the relation between theory and practice is discourse unto death. Theory begs no practice, only more text. It proceeds as if you can deconstruct power relations by shifting their markers around in your head. Like all formal idealism, this approach to theory tends unselfconsciously to reproduce existing relations of dominance, in part because it is an utterly removed

2. Audre Lorde (1984, p.60). The whole quotation is “Black feminists speak as women because we are women and do not need others to speak for us.”