

Several Sketches of Myself, Only One is Accurate, by Carla Cabrera Zamali

When you draw yourself you can draw yourself as you are or as you want to be!

Now comes the part in the show where I attempt to relate my argument to myself... and can I? Yeah! Well ever since I was 3, I had the dream of winning the Nobel Prize in Biology...

But I really was happy in English and Pdr Sci classes, I always felt excited to learn and debate. But I had never planned to be anything but a scientist...

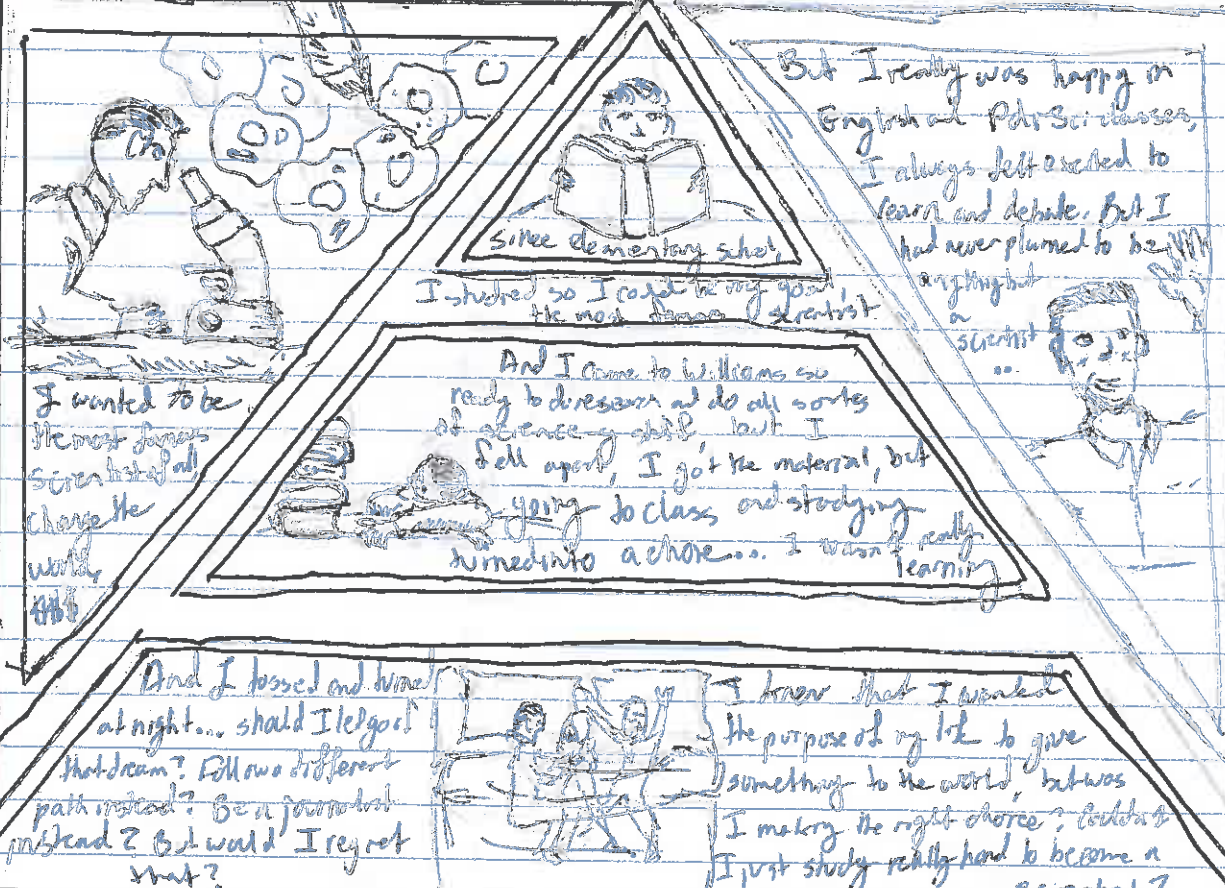

I studied so I could be my goal, the most famous biologist.

And I came to Williams so ready to disprove and do all sorts of science-y stuff, but I fell apart, I got the material, but going to class and studying turned into a chore... I wasn't really learning.

I wanted to be the most famous scientist that all change the world.

And I tossed and turned at night... should I let go of that dream? Follow a different path instead? Be a journalist instead? But would I regret that?

I knew that I wanted the purpose of my life to give something to the world, but was I making the right choice? Couldn't I just study really hard to become a scientist?

But if I truly wanted to have a meaningful impact, I should do something I love and am good at. I can work very hard to become a scientist, but I'll become not so happy and always struggle.

me, as a scientist who works in a laboratory?

So I dropped Bio and have a new goal. I learned I'm always who I think I am and always be drawing and redrawing myself and my dreams.
